Can an RBS ETN trade at a premium or discount to its redemption value?

Yes. The market price for an RBS ETN may, at any time, be higher or lower than its redemption value for various reasons. For example, market or other factors could potentially prevent RBS N.V. from issuing additional securities of existing RBS ETNs, which may result in increased demand for those ETNs, causing those ETNs to trade at a premium in the secondary market. Conversely, events such as an issuer credit rating downgrade may adversely impact the market price of RBS ETNs, causing it to trade at a discount to their redemption value. The daily repurchase feature described above is intended to induce arbitrageurs to counteract any trading of the RBS ETNs at a discount to their indicative value. However, we cannot assure you that arbitrageurs will use the repurchase feature in this manner.
